You mean don't buy it because scratching your phone with a razor blade, lighting it with a lighter on the screen, trying to break it in half or heating it up with a heat gun could cause some damage? I honestly and so sick of his videos. Its so stupid. Its like buying a car and testing if it can be keyed, if you kick it, would it dent? If you put a blow torch on it, would it melt? Its the worst test system ever. Somehow he made a career out of it. Good for him, but people act like if products fail his tests they are bad. He should do real tests. Like dropping it from a pocket on accident, putting in a pocket with keys and see if it scratches, dropping it into water, etc.

The problem with the video is that the complaint is the battery being hard to remove.

The repair procedure says you should use heat. He uses alcohol then complains its still adhered.

Until phone batteries are made to be user replaceable like the old days (pop off the back panel and swap in a new one), replacing a battery is not something probably 99.5% of the population would attempt anyways. By the time the battery is bad, chances are you would trade the phone in anyways. At the price of $499 its not cheap, but its almost a throwaway phone after 3-5 years+ in my eyes. You get a lot for $499 and that many years.

I have done my own battery repairs many times...but anymore I don't even want to risk cracking my screen to replace the battery. If the battery is bad, the phones typically old enough I am ready to swap it for something newer. Sometimes when the phones are that old and you put in a battery, that battery has been sitting on a shelf for multiple years and its not even at 100% capacity anyways, so its a gamble still.

My point still stands. Your original post made no mention of irreplaceable battery, which is the main reason for his not recommendation. Hence my reply. Anyway, moving on.

While that can be the case, I can speak from experience that sometimes batteries just suck. Hell My Nexus 6P lasted 11 months before the battery was shutting off at 20% if I opened the camera. (But in that case they actually took so long to get me a replacement it was out of warranty and instead offered me a refund on the phone entirely because they had no replacements of the exact model I had.) So I am little biased that batteries should be reliably replaceable to make sure a device lasts awhile. :)

Before the Nexus 6P, I had the LG G2 that also didn't last super long, and I even had the infamous Galaxy Nexus that was so bad on battery with its early LTE antenna. I actually would carry spare batteries for that one and swap them during the day using it for work and some of those batteries were losing capacity fast!

Yes it happens but Google's been great on warranty replacements in my experience. Replaced my wife's pixel 6a late last year for a bloated battery out of warranty. So I will gamble. Ultimately I want the old battery style and a pop off back. I don't care about waterproofing as much, just make a back panel with a rubber seal and it will suffice.

Where are you, in Canada? or Toronto in particular? its been a considerable run around with the "official" repair/replace vendor. Also any damage to the screen voids the no charge batter replacement, rendering a phone we may have had for years unusable because of a tiny crack. Google dropped the ball in my opinion in Canada at least. Pixel is a big gamble as far as I'm concerned with such a response to a safety recall.

I'm more sick of these posts with just a link to a video. No thoughts or insights from the poster, just some video I'm supposed to watch and then come back here to discuss. Just the click baity title.

I'm surprised he doesn't check if phone can survive airplane mode mode than 2 times.

The tests are about as useless as things like saying these things. Things I could hear him saying...

-Now for the peanut butter test. I'm not pleased to see that Googles earpieces are not peanut butter proof tested. You can see the peanut butter isn't coming out of the speaker or mic holes. Not good Google.

-Next up, the cat litter box test. I'm sad to say, after letting my cat pee on it, this phone still smells like urine. It should repel that smell better with a better urine resistant coating. Its a feature I'd like to see Google make better next year.

-This phone isn't taking up as much space being smaller, for that I don't like it because Elon Musk wants to go to space...maybe he'll take Donald there and leave him. For that reason, I would not buy this phone because Google made the map say Gulf of America...speaking of that, here's a video of my sponsor for storage space you can buy for your phone.
